Central America

Human concern undermines factions

By Stephen Cole

The United States' policy towards Central America has profoundly changed in recent years. The United States' policy towards Central America has profoundly changed in recent years. The United States' policy towards Central America has profoundly changed in recent years.

In the early 1960s, the United States' policy towards Central America was characterized by strong support for authoritarian regimes, particularly in Guatemala and El Salvador. This policy was based on a concern for national security and the perception of these countries as critical to U.S. strategic interests.

However, in the late 1970s and early 1980s, the United States' policy towards Central America began to change. There was a growing recognition of the human rights abuses committed by these regimes, and an increasing concern for the political stability and economic development of the region.

The United States' policy towards Central America in the late 1970s and early 1980s was marked by a shift away from direct support for authoritarian regimes, and towards more indirect forms of assistance. This included increased funding for human rights organizations, and greater emphasis on democracy and civil liberties.

The film "Casablanca," a 1942 romantic thriller directed by Michael Curtiz, was shown at the American Film Institute's screening of "The Best of Hollywood" series two weeks ago.

The film was chosen to be shown as part of the series, which is sponsored by the AFI and the National Endowment for the Arts, because it is a classic film that is often overlooked and forgotten.

The screening was attended by a large audience, which included many film enthusiasts and scholars.

The film was accompanied by a live orchestra, which played music from the film.

After the screening, a discussion was held with some of the film's cast members, including Humphrey Bogart and Ingrid Bergman.

The discussion was moderated by AFI director Kent Jones.

The film was shown again the following week, and was equally well-received.

Trio features 'dumka'

by Ron Hart

The Kolchisht-Lisnevsky Trio, a nationally recognized group of Russian musicians, will present a special evening of Russian music in the Concert Hall of the College Musicum.

The concert will begin with the trio's performances of some of their most beloved Russian songs and dances.

The trio will then move on to more contemporary works, including a piece by the Russian composer Dvořák.

The concert will conclude with the trio's performance of a Russian folk song, "Dumka," which has become a staple of their repertoire.

The trio's music is known for its emotional intensity and its ability to capture the spirit of the Russian people.

Nine students exhibit self-portrait sculpture

by Chikako Imai

The University of California, Los Angeles, is hosting an exhibition of self-portrait sculptures by nine students.

The exhibition, which opened last month, features works by students from the UCLA sculpture program.

The sculptures, which vary in style and technique, are all self-portraits, and each one is a unique representation of the artist's identity.

The exhibition is part of a larger effort by the UCLA art department to promote student work and to provide a platform for students to showcase their talents.

The exhibition will run through the end of the month, and is open to the public.

A Different Thanksgiving

On the vice presidency

President Florio's announcement of the new vice president for planning and administration is a welcome addition to the administrative organization. The qualifications of the individuals selected for these positions will bring a bright light to guide both the students and the university community.

There has been a great need within the university for someone to provide this direction. After the completion of the Yearly Studies report, the university's concerns and objectives as it pertains to the future were laid out. It is hoped that President Florio can utilize consultants to help guide the university in its decision-process.

Several factors have been considered in the selection of these individuals. First, the prospective candidates will have to present the press release of the details of the Yearly Studies report. This information should be available to the students and faculty to understand the reasoning behind the selection. Second, the candidates must be able to demonstrate the ability to think critically and provide well-reasoned arguments.

There is only one thing that we forget. We forget that the whole world does not think in the same manner that we do. We forget that our ideas and beliefs are not the only ones that are valid. We forget that the world is full of diversity, and that everyone has their own unique perspective. It is important for us to remember this when making decisions and forming opinions.

President Florio is also expected to take some time in order to preserve the strength of our institution. This is a promising step in the right direction.

Remembering Kennedy

As we approach the 50th anniversary of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, it is important to remember the impact he had on our world and the world in which he lived.

Kennedy's presidency marked a turning point in American history. He was a man who understood the power of the press and was able to use it to his advantage. His ability to connect with the people and inspire them was one of his greatest strengths.

Some of the key events of his presidency included the Cuban Missile Crisis, the Space Race, and the Civil Rights Movement. These events provided a platform for Kennedy to showcase his leadership skills and his commitment to progress.

Kennedy's legacy continues to be felt today. His emphasis on education and science has led to significant advancements in these fields. His vision for a stronger, more secure America continues to inspire leaders and citizens alike.

On Thanksgiving Day, we honor Kennedy by remembering the impact he had on our world. It is a time to reflect on his legacy and to consider how we can continue to build on his work for a better future.
At large when worldwide concerns about the arms race in its fever pitch, ABC television plans to air a movie about the horror of nuclear war. Titled "The Day After," this film deals with life in Lawrence, Kansas, on the day after an atomic strike. The film is set in a metropolitan weathered post-a- nuk war location.

In the following days, the survivors struggle to keep their heads above water in the face of starvation, illness, radiation, and mutual distrust. The cast includes such stars as Jane Alexander, Gates McFadden, and Gary Grimes. The movie was made available for prime-time play.

Now, one might ask, why would a major television network risk an estimated $1 million in losses on a project of such a nature? President of ABC News Pictures William Geddie said, "The movie simply says that nuclear war is horrid. That is all it says..."

Some conservatives oppose both the film's release and the following discussion that it will generate. Abercrombie claims that the film represents a tradition of nuclear pacifism, and that the film's "political correctness" is its main target as a day for anti-nuclear protests. Lawrence, Kansas, has even banned its own art gallery exhibit, "Lawrence Lives.

"By witnessing the outcome of a nuclear exchange, if only in a made- for-TV movie, we can reemphasize the need for the U.S. to use its nuclear arsenal to keep the peace, not destroy it!"

The Day After

ABC film on nuclear war draws controversy

By witnessing the outcome of a nuclear exchange, if only in a made- for-TV movie, we can reemphasize the need for the U.S. to use its nuclear arsenal to keep the peace, not destroy it!

"Although the film has lofty ideals which may have originated in sincerely objective thought, it is, simply put, a dramatic creation put forth by an irrevocable inordinate vignette that rarely has exhibited much sincere forethought in its planning and programming."
Design, dialect add to play's success

dicated by Carmen Fairbanks

Shakespeare's Forest of Arden comes alive at the University Theatre with a production of "As You Like It," which concludes its 14-performance run tonight at 7:30 pm.

First performed around 1600, "As You Like It" is a pastoral romance and one of Shakespeare's most popular plays today. It is notable for its use of the pastoral genre, which is a setting where people return to nature to escape the complications of city life.

The story is set in the forest of Arden, which is inhabited by a group of exiles who have been banished from the court of Duke Senior. The exiles include the melancholy Duke, his sister, Rosalind, and her friend, Ganymede (disguised as a young man named Ali). The play follows the characters' adventures as they navigate the complexities of love and identity.

The reviewer notes that the production brings a new sense of vitality to the words of the play, making it a vibrant and enjoyable experience for the audience.

Folk artists display crafts

By Jane Flascher

Wooden Art: Joe Pfeiffer, a self-trained furniture builder, has built a reputation for his craftsmanship. He uses only the finest woods and hand tools to create his pieces. His work is featured this weekend at the Folks Arts Festival in Pella, Iowa.

Pfeiffer's pieces are known for their attention to detail and use of traditional woodworking techniques. He has been working with wood since he was a child, and his passion for the craft has only grown over the years.

Pfeiffer's work is featured in the Folks Arts Festival, where visitors can see a variety of crafts and talk with artists about their work.

Pfeiffer believes that woodworking is a way to connect with nature and bring a sense of serenity to the people who use his pieces.

"I guess it's in my blood," Pfeiffer said. "I was born with the need to make things with my hands."
